

Fair competition is essential for free markets to operate properly. By requiring LECs to accomodate other ISP providers, the FCC enables competition which reduces anti-competitive tendencies and the need for the FCC to further micro-manage offerings. This is a much more efficient scheme for the FCC and a win for American consumers. With greater broadband, more youths learn from the network and have better skills to build the future of America.